Commentary: Sen. Nancy Cassis

Shine more light on state government

Sen. Nancy Cassis

The hard-working taxpayers of Michigan and citizens across the rest of the country are weary of the status quo. They have lost patience with inefficient government bureaucrats who seem incapable of solving problems and are unwilling to share vital information with the elected representatives of the people.

It's time to bring greater sunshine to the decision-making process.

That's why I have reintroduced a comprehensive package of bills that would bring more transparency to Michigan government. They passed the Senate last session and deserve swift enactment by both chambers in 2009.

We can no longer be kept in the dark when critical decisions are underway. My reforms would make a big difference. Taxpayers will benefit from laws that are more comprehensive and accurate; businesses will profit by gaining access to information on tax credits; and legislators will be able to make informed decisions on tax policy based on factual, reliable data.

Many of us learned a great deal during the lengthy debate about overhauling Michigan's business tax system. If lawmakers are unable to verify data or have access to critical information when writing bills, even well-meaning legislation can be inaccurate or incomplete.

Requiring disclosure of this information can help avoid unintended consequences.

Senate Bill 70 will require the Department of Treasury to share aggregate tax information by business category with the chair of the Senate Finance Committee, the chair of the House Tax Policy Committee and the directors of the House and Senate fiscal agencies.

My measures safeguard individual privacy and confidentiality. This legislation does not infringe upon our residents' right to privacy.

The bills deal with aggregate information, not specific information on individuals.

SB 71 would require Treasury to create and post on its Web site a database detailing all of the Michigan Business Tax credits available to businesses, how many companies are claiming the credits and how much is claimed annually.

Another proposal, SB 72, would specifically require that the Michigan Economic Growth Authority (MEGA) annual reports include:

?The actual number of jobs created by MEGA recipients;

?The actual amount of capital investment made by the credit recipients; and

?The actual value of the tax credit claimed by companies receiving MEGA tax credits.

The measure also requires the auditor general to audit the MEGA report before it is submitted to the Legislature, and requires the report be submitted to the chairs of the Senate Finance Committee, the House Tax Policy Committee, the Senate and House appropriations committees, and the directors of the House and Senate fiscal agencies.

This essential package of bills will help ensure that a system of checks and balances is in place to serve the public good. Open, transparent government provides for appropriate disclosure, which is vital in making sensible decisions.

But an open process is only a start. Once armed with useful data, policymakers must have the courage to make the tough choices. By avoiding the day of reckoning, Michigan has failed to fix the state's long-term structural problems and exacerbated the budget shortfall.

It's time to get our house in order. Instead of making budget decisions in one room and tax policy choices in another, we need to get under one roof and devise a coordinated policy that reflects current economic realities while preparing us for a brighter future.

We can't afford to be complacent. The first step to a more effective government is transparency. Our new president has already signed executive orders to make the process more open. Michigan Attorney General Mike Cox has been a leader on this issue and several states including Texas, Minnesota, Missouri and South Carolina have passed legislation requiring free, searchable Web sites with detailed information about state expenditures.

In summary, making Michigan's government transparent, open, and effective will enhance credibility with the public.

State Sen. Nancy Cassis, R-Novi, is chair of the Senate Finance Committee.
